RETRIEVED FROM DEMOCRACYDOCKET.COM

Defendants Scott Schwab and Derek Schmidt, each sued in their official capacities and acting by and through their undersigned counsel, respectfully move to dismiss the Plaintiffs' Petition for: (i) lack of subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(1); and (ii) failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted pursuant to Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(6).

I. – Introduction

Plaintiffs' Petition challenges the constitutionality – under various provisions of the Bill of Rights of the Kansas Constitution – of four election integrity statutes recently passed by the Kansas Legislature (over the Governor's veto). The Petition is chock-full of hyperbolic rhetoric, completely irrelevant discussion about the supposedly “chaotic path to passage” of the two bills in which these measures are contained (i.e., Senate Substitute for House Bill 2183, and House Bill 2332), and policy-grounded attacks on the legislation from liberal activists and Democratic Party legislators whose views failed to carry the day at the statehouse. Employing what can only be described as Orwellian language that utterly mischaracterizes the statutes, Plaintiffs claim the challenged provisions will impede their ability to engage with members of the community and will somehow make it more difficult for individuals to vote. (Pet. ¶ 5). Not only are all of these allegations baseless, but Plaintiffs lack standing – either on their own or on behalf of their members or Kansas voters at large – to pursue any of the asserted claims. Moreover, the State's powerful interests in combating voter fraud, protecting the integrity of the electoral process, and ensuring the orderly administration of elections should, under well-entrenched case law, easily allow the Court to dispatch with all of Plaintiffs' myriad causes of action.

Each of the statutes at issue here – (i) a criminal prohibition on impersonating election officials, which Plaintiffs absurdly describe as a “Voter Education Restriction,” (ii) a signature verification requirement for advance ballots submitted through the mail, which Plaintiffs call a “Signature Rejection Requirement,” (iii) a ballot harvesting restriction that prevents third-parties from delivering more than ten ballots of other individuals to the election office in any election, which Plaintiffs characterize as a “Delivery Assistance Ban,” and (iv) a restriction on third-parties not domiciled in Kansas from sending out advance ballot applications to Kansas voters, which Plaintiffs label an “Advocacy Ban,” – are nondiscriminatory, common-sense measures that enhance the public’s confidence in the integrity of our electoral process, an objective that the Supreme Court has described as “essential to the functioning of our participatory democracy.” Purcell v. Gonzalez, 549 U.S. 1, 4 (2006). Plaintiffs’ legal attacks on these provisions have been waged against highly similar statutes throughout the country and, with only rare exceptions, have been squarely rejected. The claims in the case at bar should meet with the same fate.

II. – Standards Governing Motion to Dismiss

A. – Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim

Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(6) allows for dismissal of claims if the petition fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Univ. of Kan. Mem’l Corp. v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 31 Kan. App.2d 177, 179, 61 P.3d 741 (2003). Dismissal for failure to state a claim is justified “when the allegations in a petition clearly demonstrate a plaintiff does not have a claim.” Seaboard Corp. v. Marsh Inc., 295 Kan. 384, 392, 284 P.3d 314 (2012). Historically, the Kansas Supreme Court has held that, in reviewing the legal sufficiency of a claim in response to a motion to dismiss under Section 60-212(b)(6), a court “must decide the issue based only on the well-plead facts and allegations, which are generally drawn from the petition,” and must also “resolve every factual dispute in the plaintiff’s favor.” Halley v. Barbabe, 271 Kan. 652, 656, 24 P.3d 140 (2001) (citations omitted).

But recent developments in the federal standards for evaluating motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the language of which is identical to Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(6), counsel strongly in favor of applying the same federal standard to this action. Indeed, when first articulating the standard governing motions to dismiss in state court, the Kansas Supreme Court expressly relied on the then-applicable federal standard, noting that Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(6) had been patterned after its federal counterpart. Monroe v. Darr, 214 Kan. 426, 430, 520 P.2d 1197 (1974); accord Back-Wenzel v. Williams, 279 Kan. 346, 349, 109 P.3d 1194 (2005) (“[B]ecause the Kansas Rules of Civil Procedure are patterned after the federal rules, Kansas appellate courts often turn to federal case law for persuasive guidance.”). On the one occasion when the Kansas Supreme Court was asked to adopt the federal standard, the Court declined to do so only because the issue had not been properly preserved on appeal. See Williams v. C-U-Out Bonds, LLC, 310 Kan. 775, 785, 450 P.3d 330 (2019). But the Court clearly did not reject the argument on the merits. In light of the totally overlapping language in the controlling state and federal rules, and the re-interpretation of the federal standard recently adopted by the U.S. Supreme Court, it is time for Kansas to once again conform its standard to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Conformity with the notice-pleading requirements of Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-208(a)(1) are enforced by way of a motion filed under Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(6). The U.S. Supreme Court – in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S.

662 (2009) – reinterpreted Federal Rule 8(a)(2), the counterpart to Kansas Rule 8(a)(1). The Court abandoned the long-held rule “that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.” See, e.g., Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45–46 (1957). Instead, the Court in Twombly and Iqbal directed that a two-step inquiry be undertaken. First, the reviewing court must disregard all recitals in the complaint that are mere legal conclusions. Second, the reviewing court must accept assertions in a complaint as true, for the purposes of a motion to dismiss, only if the trial judge finds those factual assertions plausible as a matter of judicial common sense.

In evaluating whether this standard is met, Plaintiffs’ Petition must contain “enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face,” and Plaintiffs must “nudge [their] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.” Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. The Petition also must contain “more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.” Id. at 550. Equally insufficient is the “unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.” Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. A claim has “facial plausibility” only if “the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.” Id.

The Court must “accept all well-pleaded facts as true and view them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff.” Jordan-Arapahoe, LLP v. Bd. of Cnty. Com'rs of Cnty. of Arapahoe, Colo., 633 F.3d 1022, 1025 (10th Cir. 2011). But this general rule is inapplicable where the plaintiff’s allegations are simply legal conclusions. “Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice.” Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). As the Supreme Court observed, “[w]here a Complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant’s liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.” Id. (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557) (internal quotations omitted).¹

B. – Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

The standard governing a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-212(b)(1) differs slightly from the standard governing a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. In light of the identical wording of the applicable rules, Kansas courts often look to federal law in articulating the standard. See Parisi v. Unified Gov’t of Wyandotte County, No. 118,284, 2018 WL 5728439, at *4-5 (Kan. Ct. App. Nov. 2, 2018).

Motions to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction can take one of two forms. A defendant may assert a “facial challenge to the plaintiffs’ allegations concerning subject matter jurisdiction, thereby questioning the sufficiency of the complaint.” United States v. Rodriguez-Aguirre, 264 F.3d 1195, 1203 (10th Cir. 2001). The district court must accept the allegations in the Complaint as true when analyzing a facial attack. Id. Alternatively, as is being done here, a defendant “may go beyond allegations contained in the Complaint and challenge the facts upon which subject matter jurisdiction depends.” Id. The district court “does not presume the truthfulness of the complaint’s factual allegations” in evaluating such a factual attack, but “has wide discretion to allow affidavits, other documents, and a limited evidentiary hearing to resolve disputed jurisdictional facts.” Id. The burden to establish these elements of standing rests with the plaintiff. Gannon v. State, 298 Kan. 1107, 1123, 319 P.3d 1196 (2014).

¹ To be clear, Defendants believe that Plaintiffs’ claims in this action must be dismissed under either the historical Kansas standard or the revised federal standard now being advocated.

III. – Argument

Plaintiffs’ Petition is a patchwork of different constitutional claims that almost requires a scorecard to keep track of which particular constitutional theories are being invoked against each of the voting integrity provisions at issue here. Although some repetition is unavoidable, the most logical and efficient way of describing the deficiencies in Plaintiffs’ causes of action is to address the new legislative enactments one-by-one. But before doing so, it is critical to address a more threshold problem confronting all the claims: Plaintiffs’ lack of standing to pursue them.

A. – Plaintiffs Lack Standing to Pursue their Claims

None of Plaintiffs’ claims challenging the election integrity statutes passed in H.B. 2183 and H.B. 2332 present a justiciable case or controversy sufficient to trigger the Court’s subject matter jurisdiction. First, Plaintiffs fail to allege a plausible claim of diversion of resources to establish organizational standing. Second, Plaintiffs lack standing to challenge the new criminal laws enacted in H.B. 2183 and H.B. 2332 given that there is no threat whatsoever of an imminent prosecution. Third, Plaintiffs cannot establish a close relationship with constituents and do not allege that any constituents are hindered from addressing their own harms. There is thus no basis for the Court to exercise jurisdiction over the claims at issue here.

Unlike the U.S. Constitution, the Kansas Constitution contains no “case or controversy” language in its description of the scope of judicial power. However, Kansas courts have adopted such a limitation pursuant to the separation of powers doctrine inherent in the state’s constitutional framework. State ex rel. Morrison v. Sebelius, 285 Kan. 875, 896, 179 P.3d 366 (2008). Further, Kansas courts may consider federal law when addressing justiciability. Gannon, 298 Kan. at 1119.

As part of the Kansas case-or-controversy requirement, courts mandate that (a) parties have standing; (b) issues are not moot; (c) issues are ripe, i.e., they have “taken fixed and final shape rather than remaining nebulous and contingent;” and (d) issues do not present a political question. Id. These justiciability requirements are broadly rooted in the Kansas Constitution’s prohibition against advisory opinions. Morrison, 285 Kan. 897–98. The fundamental principles at play are that “controversies provide factual context, arguments are sharpened by adversarial positions, and judgments resolve disputes rather than provide mere legal advice.” Id. at 897. In the absence of such a genuine and concrete dispute, any judgment by the Court would be little more than an advisory opinion on an abstract question, which is “inoperative and nugatory” and which would “remain a dead letter . . . without any operation upon the rights of the parties.” Id. (internal quotations omitted).

The doctrine of standing focuses on a party’s right to assert a legal cause of action or to seek judicial enforcement of some legal duty or right. Kan. Bldg. Indus. Workers Comp. Fund v. State, 302 Kan. 656, 678, 359 P.3d 33 (2015). “While standing is a requirement for case-or-controversy, i.e., justiciability, it is also a component of subject matter jurisdiction.” Id. (quoting Gannon, 298 Kan. at 1122). A court must be vested with subject matter jurisdiction in order for it to properly act in a case. State v. Bickford, 234 Kan. 507, 508–09, 672 P.2d 607 (1983). “If a trial court determines that it lacks subject matter jurisdiction, it has absolutely no authority to reach the merits of the case and is required as a matter of law to dismiss it.” Chelf v. State, 46 Kan. App. 2d 522, 529, 263 P.3d 852 (2011).

In their petition, Plaintiffs plead three categories of purported injuries caused by the election integrity statutes: (1) harm to Plaintiffs’ members; (2) harm to Plaintiffs themselves as organizations; and (3) harm to constituents across Kansas. In each category, the burden to establish standing rests solely with Plaintiffs. Gannon, 298 Kan. at 1123.

1. – Associational Standing

For an association to have standing to sue on behalf of its members, a three-prong test must be satisfied: (1) the members must have standing to sue individually; (2) the interests the association seeks to protect must be germane to the organization’s purpose; and (3) neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires participation of individual members. Kan. Nat’l Educ. Ass’n v. State, 305 Kan. 739, 747, 387 P.3d 795 (2017) (quoting Sierra Club v. Moser, 298 Kan. 22, 33, 310 P.3d 360 (2013)).

In addressing the first prong, a court considers whether Plaintiffs’ members have standing to sue in their own right. Friends of Bethany Place, Inc. v. City of Topeka, 297 Kan. 1112, 1126, 307 P.3d 1255 (2013). To establish standing under Kansas law, a party must demonstrate that: (1) it suffered a “cognizable injury;” and (2) there is a causal connection between the injury and the challenged conduct. Gannon, 298 Kan. at 1123. In applying these two requirements, the Kansas Supreme Court frequently refers to the federal judiciary’s standing elements. Id. That is, the party invoking a court’s jurisdiction “must present an injury that is concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; the injury must be fairly traceable to the opposing party’s challenged action; and the injury must be redressable by a favorable ruling.” Id.

When evaluating the first element of the standing test – the “cognizable injury” or “injury in fact” requirement – the Court looks to whether Plaintiffs’ members “personally suffer[ed] some actual or threatened injury as a result of the challenged conduct.” Moser, 298 Kan. at 33. “The injury must be particularized, meaning it must affect the [member] in a personal and individual way.” Id. at 35 (citing Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 n.1 (1992)). Further, a member’s purported injury “cannot be a ‘generalized grievance’ and must be more than ‘merely a general interest common to all members of the public.’” Gannon, 298 Kan. at 1123 (citing Lujan, 504 U.S. at 575).

“When a plaintiff alleges injury from the potential enforcement of a law or regulation, courts find an injury in fact only ‘under circumstances that render the threatened enforcement sufficiently imminent.’” Baker v. USD 229 Blue Valley, 979 F.3d 866, 872 (10th Cir. 2020) (quoting Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 159 (2014)). Specifically, “a plaintiff satisfies the injury-in-fact requirement where he alleges ‘an intention to engage in a course of conduct arguably affected with a constitutional interest, but proscribed by a statute, and there exists a credible threat of prosecution thereunder.’” Id. (emphasis added) (quoting Babbitt v. Farm Workers, 442 U.S. 289, 298 (1979)). A credible threat does not exist when the threat is imaginary, speculative, or hypothetical; instead, it must be well-founded and grounded in reality. Id.; see also Morrison, 285 Kan. at 890 (dispute must “be real and substantial,” which means the controversy is “of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment”). “The mere presence on the statute books of an unconstitutional statute, in the absence of enforcement or credible threat of enforcement, does not entitle anyone to sue, even if they allege an inhibiting effect on constitutionally protected conduct prohibited by the statute.” Id. (emphasis added).

Plaintiffs’ allegations fall short of establishing a particularized injury worthy of invoking this Court’s jurisdiction. Noticeably absent from Plaintiffs’ petition is any claim of a member being threatened with actual criminal liability because of the election integrity statutes. Plaintiffs do not assert that either Defendants or any county prosecutors have made any public statements or undertaken any efforts to suggest that they would prosecute individuals engaging in the type of voter outreach programs that Plaintiffs maintain are the hallmark of their work.² Nor could they so allege since no such statements have been made. And Plaintiffs bear the burden.

Moreover, to establish an injury in fact in the context of a pre-enforcement challenge to a criminal statute, Plaintiffs must demonstrate an intent to engage in the specific conduct that is being criminalized under the statute. Colo. Outfitters Ass'n v. Hickenlooper, 823 F.3d 537, 545 (10th Cir. 2016). Plaintiffs make no such claim. Taking them at their word, Plaintiffs' members have no desire or intent to knowingly engage in conduct that misleads the recipients of their communications and outreach efforts to believe Plaintiffs' members are election officials. Instead, Plaintiffs' misguided concerns center on the subjective beliefs of the recipients receiving the communication from one of Plaintiffs' respective members.

“A person acts ‘knowingly,’ or ‘with knowledge,’ with respect to the nature of such person’s conduct or to circumstances surrounding such person’s conduct when such person is aware of the nature of such person’s conduct or that the circumstances exist. A person acts ‘knowingly,’ or ‘with knowledge,’ with respect to a result of such person’s conduct when such person is aware that such person’s conduct is reasonably certain to cause the result.” Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-5202(i). Surely Plaintiffs' members do not intend to engage in conduct where they (i) knowingly cause a voter to believe Plaintiffs' members are election officials or employees of a county election office or (ii) knowingly engage in conduct where it is reasonably certain a Kansas voter will believe Plaintiffs' members are election officials.

Indeed, Plaintiffs' self-professed missions center around educating Kansans about the importance of voting and the process for voting. H.B. 2183, § 3 simply does not criminalize such efforts. The mere fact that, on occasion, a Kansas voter may entertain some subjective, innocent belief that Plaintiffs' members are election officials does not equate to knowledge or awareness that the members' conduct is reasonably certain to cause misidentification of election official status. In short, Plaintiffs fail to show any imminent threat to their members based in reality. And because Plaintiffs' members cannot show a particularized injury in fact or imminent threat of such injury fairly traceable to Defendants' actions, Plaintiffs lack standing to challenge the election official impersonation prohibitions on behalf of their members.

Similarly, Plaintiffs aver that the signature verification requirement is unconstitutional because "non-experts are significantly more likely to misidentify authentic signatures as forgeries. (Pet. ¶ 126). But Plaintiffs' hypothetical concerns about human errors do not meet Article III's requirements for standing. Cf. Memphis A. Philip Randolph Inst. v. Hargett, 978 F.3d 378, 389 (6th Cir. 2020) ("MPRI"). As was the case in MPRI, "[P]laintiffs' allegations boil down to fear of 'the ever present possibility that an election worker will make a mistake.'" Id. (quoting Shelby Advocs. for Valid Elections v. Hargett, 947 F.3d 977, 983 (6th Cir. 2020)). A wholly speculative fear that does not suffice to create standing.

Absent a credible threat of prosecution or an actual showing of imminent harm, Plaintiffs cannot invoke this Court's jurisdiction on behalf of their members. See N.H. Hemp Council, Inc. v. Marshall, 203 F.3d 1, 4–5 (1st Cir. 2000) ("In general, federal courts are disinclined to provide either injunctive or declaratory relief to foreclose federal criminal prosecutions in the absence of a reasonably clear and specific threat of prosecution.”); Phelps v. Hamilton, 122 F.3d 1309, 1327 (10th Cir. 1997) (“[T]he plaintiffs offer no evidence to support their allegation that they are threatened with prosecution under the amendment.”). Standing does not exist when Plaintiffs’ concerns of future prosecution of its members are purely hypothetical and amount to nothing more than a subjective worry. See Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 13–14 (1972) (“Allegations of a subjective ‘chill’ are not an adequate substitute for a claim of specific present objective harm or a threat of specific future harm[.]”). “If all it took to summon the jurisdiction of the . . . courts were a bare assertion that, as a result of government action, one is discouraged from speaking, there would be little left of the [constitutional standing] threshold in First Amendment cases.” See Initiative & Referendum Inst. v. Walker, 450 F.3d 1082, 1089 (10th Cir. 2006).

Standing is determined at the time the action is commenced and courts “generally look to when the complaint was first filed, not to subsequent events to determine if a plaintiff has standing.” S. Utah Wilderness All. v. Palma, 707 F.3d 1143, 1153 (10th Cir. 2013) (internal quotations omitted). Moreover, a party “is not injured by an analysis that has yet to take place.” Kan. Nat. Res. Coal. v. U.S. Dep’t of Interior, 971 F.3d 1222, 1234 (10th Cir. 2020). While Defendants may have the ultimate authority to enforce the election statutes³ (excluding Defendant Schwab and the prohibition on non-Kansans sending advance mail voting applications to Kansas voters, see note 2, supra), there has been no action by Defendants at all to do so in this case. Consequently, there is no causal connection between the alleged harm Plaintiffs' claim on behalf of their members and any action taken by Defendants. Because no imminent threat of injury traceable to Defendants and/or their conduct exists, Plaintiffs lack standing to pursue their claims on behalf of their members.

In addition to Plaintiffs' inability to meet the first element on all of their claims, Plaintiffs are unable to satisfy the second and third elements for associational standing on their challenge to the election impersonation statute. As to the second element of associational standing, Plaintiffs must show the interests they seek to protect are germane to Plaintiffs' purposes. Kan. Nat'l Educ. Ass'n, 305 Kan. at 747. It is unreasonable to presume Plaintiffs' interests include a mission of knowingly engaging in conduct that is reasonably certain to cause a voter to believe Plaintiffs' members are election officials or formal employees of county election offices. In fact, Plaintiffs do not even make such a claim. They thus fail to satisfy their burden on the second element of associational standing.

Regarding the third prong for associational standing, Plaintiffs must show that neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires the participation of individual members in the lawsuit. Id. The mere fact that Plaintiffs seek only declaratory and injunctive relief does not automatically end the Court's inquiry. See Kan. Health Care Ass'n, Inc. v. Kan. Dep't of Soc. & Rehab. Servs., 958 F.2d 1018, 1021–22 (10th Cir. 1992). The Court must also evaluate the nature of Plaintiffs' claims and consider whether such claims require individualized participation by Plaintiffs' respective members. See, e.g., 312 Educ. Ass'n v. U.S.D. No. 312, 273 Kan. 875, 887, 47 P.3d 383 (2002) ("Evidence relating to each of such teachers may have to be separately examined. In order to properly litigate 312 E.A.'s claim, participation of individual members from the association would appear to be required in order to resolve the claim asserted portion of the association representation test.”).

Plaintiffs allege that their members engage in various voter education and outreach activities, some of which are the same activities performed by election officials. Plaintiffs also allege there are times where a member is mistaken for an election official while engaging in certain outreach efforts. But context is critical and every scenario may yield a different result depending on the circumstances. Moreover, each member’s knowledge is crucial in determining whether he/she is engaging in conduct violative of H.B. 2183 § 3(a). The Court thus cannot evaluate whether the statute infringes on the rights of Plaintiffs’ members without reviewing the applicable facts. That kind of review necessarily requires the individualized participation of Plaintiffs’ members and does not lend itself to associational standing.

2. – Organizational Standing

In addition to being unable to establish associational standing, Plaintiffs similarly cannot show organizational standing. To demonstrate organizational standing, each Plaintiff must show that, as an organization, it “suffered a concrete and demonstrable interest to its activities which goes beyond a mere setback to abstract social interests.” Animal Legal Def. Fund, et. al. v. Kelly, 434 F. Supp. 3d 974, 995–96 (D. Kan. 2020). A direct conflict between Defendants’ conduct and Plaintiffs’ respective missions must also be present to show organizational standing. Id.

Once again, Plaintiffs are unable to meet their burden. Absent from Plaintiffs’ Petition are any legitimate instances of particularized harm to Plaintiffs themselves. As noted in more detail below, Plaintiffs’ ability to educate Kansans about the advance mail voting process and promote the importance of voting remains intact. The election integrity statutes simply do not impair the message Plaintiffs desire to communicate to Kansans. At most, Plaintiffs are required to tinker with the mechanics of how they relay their communications. Logistical readjustments, however, do not an injury make. See, e.g., Clark v. Edwards, 468 F. Supp. 3d 725, 748 (M.D. La. 2020). “Injury does not arise because of [an organization’s] desire or preference for a different scheme of absentee by mail voting, nor because they adjust their organization’s activities in response to the Virus and the Virus-related changes to the law. The law is not static. It cannot follow that every change in voting laws that causes voting advocacy groups to ‘check and adjust’ is an injury.” Id.

Moreover, Plaintiffs fail to show a plausible claim of diversion of resources to counteract any alleged impact on their missions caused by the election integrity statutes. At most, Plaintiffs have suggested that their plans to implement certain voter education outreach programs may be on hold while they seek relief from this Court. But any chilling effect on their missions has been self-induced because there is no imminent threat of criminal prosecution by Defendants (or, for that matter, any other county prosecutor). Plaintiffs’ unilateral decision to stay their voter education outreach programs, absent a credible risk of liability, does not equate to a legitimate claim that they diverted resources as a result of the new election protection laws. “Diversion of organizational resources to litigation is a self-inflicted budgetary decision which does not qualify as an injury in fact for standing purposes.” Id. In sum, Plaintiffs’ claims fall far short of establishing a concrete injury to their respective organizations, and this Court, therefore, lacks subject matter jurisdiction to review those claims.

3. – Standing On Behalf of Constituents

In addition to themselves and their respective members, Plaintiffs challenge the election integrity statutes on behalf of constituents across Kansas. But missing from their Petition is any showing of an actual relationship with Kansas voters worthy of invoking this Court’s jurisdiction over Plaintiffs’ allegations made on behalf of any constituent.

Typically, a plaintiff may not assert the rights of others. Kowalski v. Tesmer, 543 U.S. 125, 129 (2004). This standing principle “assumes that the party with the right has the appropriate incentive to challenge (or not challenge) governmental action and to do so with the necessary zeal and appropriate presentation.” Id. When a plaintiff asserts standing on behalf of a third party, two additional elements are required to be met: (1) the party asserting the right must have a close relationship with the person who possesses the right; and (2) there must be a hindrance to the possessor’s ability to protect his own interests. Id. at 130. In an unpublished decision, the Kansas Court of Appeals – citing Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410–11 (1991) and Naumoff v. Old, 167 F. Supp. 2d 1250, 1252 (D. Kan. 2001) – also included a third requirement: the litigant “must have suffered an ‘injury in fact,’ thus giving him or her a ‘sufficiently concrete interest’ in the outcome of the issue in dispute[.]” State v. Wade, No. 112,121, 356 P.3d 436, 2015 WL 5458557, at *2 (Kan. Ct. App. Sept. 18, 2015).

Plaintiffs fail to meet their mark. As already addressed, Plaintiffs have not suffered an injury in fact. Nor have they made a plausible claim of any legitimate or close relationship with Kansas voters sufficient to satisfy third-party standing standards. Their generalized concerns about the broader Kansas electorate does not cut it. See, e.g., Democracy N. Carolina v. N. Carolina State Bd. of Elections, 476 F. Supp.3d 158, 189 (M.D.N.C. 2020), (rejecting the organizational plaintiffs' argument that "[d]irectly assisting voters is . . . an essential means of how [the plaintiffs] build relationships and associate with voters, including our members," and that "[v]oters have already communicated to [plaintiffs] their concerns and their confusion[]"). Likewise, Plaintiffs' alleged inability to collect and deliver ballots from unnamed voters does not create the type of relationship necessary to establish third-party standing. Id. Moreover, Plaintiffs' Petition is devoid of any claim or suggestion that Kansas voters are hindered from protecting their own interests allegedly affected by the election integrity statutes at issue in this case. In sum, Plaintiffs lack standing on behalf of any third-party constituent.

B. – The Election Official Impersonation Statute is Not Unconstitutional

Plaintiffs' first constitutional challenge is directed at the Legislature's attempt to prohibit individuals from knowingly impersonating election officials, see H.B. 2183, § 3, a provision that Plaintiffs mischaracterize as a "Voter Education Restriction." (Pet. ¶ 4). Plaintiffs claim that the new criminal statute will chill their speech because it supposedly has no intent element and thus leaves organizers "to guess as to when and whether their voter assistance and education activities might potentially be misperceived." (Id.). Plaintiffs argue that the statute's definition of "false representation of an election official" is inherently subjective, thereby exposing them to criminal liability just because a voter mistakenly believes that he/she is communicating with an election official. (Id. at ¶ 104). They assert that the impersonation statute contravenes their rights to free speech and association (Count I), and is both unconstitutionally overbroad (Count IV) and vague (Count V). Plaintiffs have misread the statute and their allegations of potential harms that flow from this perfectly valid legislative enactment are devoid of merit.

1. – Freedom of Speech and Association (Count I)

Plaintiffs contend that the election official impersonation statute violates Sections 3 and 11 of the Kansas Constitution’s Bill of Rights by “hindering [them] from engaging in virtually all” of the voter registration and other voter educational activities that are core to their missions. (Id.) Isolating on the statutory language that prohibits an individual from knowingly engaging in conduct that gives the (false) appearance of being an election official or that would cause another person to believe (falsely) that the individual engaging in such conduct is an election official, H.B. 2183, § 3(a)(2)-(3), Plaintiffs aver that their protected speech and association rights are inhibited because the new law criminalizes communicative activity over which they have no control, i.e., how third-parties might perceive Plaintiffs’ status, even if mistaken. (Id. at ¶¶ 98-112). Plaintiffs’ argument is built entirely on a foundation of sand. There is nothing in the election official impersonation statute that diminishes, let alone prohibits, Plaintiffs from engaging in the voter registration/advocacy efforts that are purportedly critical to their mission.

a. – Court Need Not Grapple with Murky Legal Standard

Plaintiffs insist that their claim be subjected to “exacting scrutiny” because their activity amounts to “core speech” and thus is entitled to the highest level of constitutional protection. (Id. at ¶¶ 168-70). The Kansas Supreme Court has not spoken as to the proper legal standard in this context,⁴ and federal case law is not exactly a model of clarity. Defendants are unaware of any specific case addressing the proper level of scrutiny in a constitutional challenge to an impersonation statute such as the one at issue here. The parties are in general agreement that courts typically employ the so-called Meyer-Buckley framework to scrutinize state statutes and regulations targeting core political speech. See Meyer v. Grant, 486 U.S. 414 (1988); Buckley v. Am. Const. Law Found., Inc., 552 U.S. 182 (1999)). On the other hand, where a dispute revolves around the mechanics of the electoral process rather than pure speech, courts invoke the so-called Anderson-Burdick standard. See Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780 (1982); Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428 (1992)).

Focusing on core speech restrictions, the Meyer-Buckley test applies “exacting scrutiny,” which requires that a law targeting expressive activity must be narrowly tailored to serve a sufficiently important governmental interest in order to pass muster. See Ams. for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta, ___ S. Ct. ___, Nos. 19-251 & 19-255, 2021 WL 2690268, at *6-7 (U.S. July 1, 2021) (evaluating constitutional challenge to California law requiring forced disclosure of names of organization’s donors); id. at * 7 (“While exacting scrutiny does not require that disclosure regimes be the least restrictive means of achieving their ends, it does require that they be narrowly tailored to the government’s asserted interest.”).

Anderson-Burdick, meanwhile, utilizes a sliding scale / balancing test under which the court assesses the burden that a state’s regulation imposes on a plaintiff’s First Amendment rights. “[W]hen those rights are subjected to severe restrictions, the regulation is subject to strict scrutiny and must be narrowly drawn to advance a state interest of compelling importance.” Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434. But when those rights are subjected to reasonable, nondiscriminatory restrictions, the law is exposed to a far less searching review that is “closer to rational basis and the State’s important regulatory interests are generally sufficient to justify the restrictions.” Ohio Democratic Party v. Husted, 834 F.3d 620, 627 (6th Cir. 2016) (citing Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434).

“Regulations falling somewhere in between – i.e., regulations that impose a more-than-minimal but less-than-severe burden – require a ‘flexible’ analysis, weighing the burden on the plaintiffs against the state’s asserted interest and chosen means of pursuing it.” Id. (quotation omitted).

Lurking in the background at all times, however, is the fundamental principle that “states have wide latitude in determining how to manage their election procedures.” ACLU v. Santillanes, 546 F.3d 1313, 1321 (10th Cir. 2008). Indeed, when a state carries out its authority to regulate elections to ensure that they are fair and orderly, the resulting restrictions will “inevitably affect – at least to some degree – the individual’s right to vote and his right to associate with others for political ends.” Anderson, 460 U.S. at 788; accord Crawford v. Marion County Election Bd., 553 U.S. 181, 198 (2008). These burdens “must necessarily accommodate a state’s legitimate interest in providing order, stability, and legitimacy to the electoral process.” Utah Republican Party v. Cox, 892 F.3d 1066, 1077 (10th Cir. 2018).

There is no need for the Court to wade into the murky waters of the correct legal standard here. The statutory text itself undermines Plaintiffs’ free speech/freedom of association attack on the election official impersonation statute. The new statute is reproduced in full below:

- (a) False representation of an election official is knowingly engaging in any of the following conduct by phone, mail, email, website or other online activity or by any other means of communication while not holding a position as an election official:
 - (1) Representing oneself as an election official;
 - (2) engaging in conduct that gives the appearance of being an election official; or
 - (3) engaging in conduct that would cause another person to believe a person engaging in such conduct is an election official.
- (b) False representation of an election official is a severity level 7, nonperson felony.

- (c) As used in this section, “election official” means the secretary of state, or any employee thereof, any county election commissioner or county clerk, or any employee thereof, or any other person employed by any county election office.

H.B. 2183, § 3 (emphasis added).

The very first sentence of the statute makes it abundantly clear that the only conduct being prohibited is an individual knowingly engaging in activities intended to falsely give the appearance that he/she is an election official or would cause a person to so believe. The focus, in other words, is on the speaker, not on the subjective views of any particular listener. Moreover, the effect of the speaker’s conduct on any listener will be judged under an objective standard. The notion, therefore, that Plaintiffs’ members might be prosecuted because some naïve citizen misapprehended a member’s non-official status is preposterous and would necessitate a complete disregard of the statutory language.

Plaintiffs’ claim is further undermined by the Kansas criminal code’s definition of what it means to act “knowingly.” As noted in Part II’s standing discussion above, Kansas law provides that a “person acts ‘knowingly,’ or ‘with knowledge,’ with respect to the nature of such person’s conduct or to circumstances surrounding such person’s conduct when such person is aware of the nature of such person’s conduct or that the circumstances exist. A person acts ‘knowingly,’ or ‘with knowledge,’ with respect to a result of such person’s conduct when such person is aware that such person’s conduct is reasonably certain to cause the result.” Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-5202(i). The focus is not on the subjective views of the listener. When the new impersonation law is interpreted in line with realistic linguistic principles and in conjunction with the State’s criminal code definitions, Plaintiffs’ entire claim dissolves.

Because the election official impersonation statute at issue does not actually infringe on Plaintiffs' constitutionally protected rights, the most deferential (i.e., rational basis) standard is appropriate here. Ultimately, however, there is no need in this lawsuit for the Court to stake out a position on the proper standard. Regardless of whether the "exacting scrutiny" test of Meyer-Buckley or the sliding-scale / balancing test of Anderson-Burdick is applied, the bottom line is that the challenged statute in no way diminishes Plaintiffs' ability to engage in any protected expressive activities. Plaintiffs endeavor to erect a straw man by advocating for the broadest conceivable reading of the statute and then lamenting a parade of horrors that might flow therefrom. But that is not a proper canon of statutory construction.

This statute does nothing more than proscribe an individual from knowingly engaging in conduct that would either give the appearance, or cause another person to believe, that he/she is an election official when the contrary is true. The impact on the listener is viewed objectively. In fact, the only subjective component to the law is the speaker's intent; if the speaker did not knowingly intend to convey such a false impression, then the statute is not violated. Other than deliberately misrepresenting his/her status as an election official (i.e., lying) – which is clearly not protected activity – the impersonation statute does absolutely nothing to adversely impact Plaintiffs' free speech rights.

Importantly, even in the core political speech line of cases upon which Plaintiffs rely, the U.S. Supreme Court has emphasized states' powerful interest in preventing both fraud and false statements, particularly "during election campaigns when false statements, if credited, may have serious adverse consequences for the public at large." McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Comm'n, 514 U.S. 334, 349 (1985). It is only when a state effectively bars substantially all speech, or at least the most effective means of communication, in pursuit of that objective has the Supreme Court exposed the law to exacting scrutiny and struck it down. See id. at 357 (striking down Ohio’s prohibition against distribution of anonymous campaign literature); Meyer, 486 U.S. at 422-28 (invalidating Colorado’s restriction against paying circulators of initiative petitions, which had the effect of limiting the most effective means of reaching voters and impeding the proponents’ ability to place their issues on the ballot). Despite Plaintiffs’ protestations to the contrary, that is emphatically not what the Kansas election official impersonation statute does. Moreover, to the extent a statute is “readily susceptible” to a narrowing construction that will allow it to survive a First Amendment / free speech constitutional challenge, the Court is required to construe the law in such manner. Voting for Am., Inc. v. Steen, 732 F.3d 382, 397 (5th Cir. 2013) (citing Va. v. Am. Booksellers Ass’n, Inc., 484 U.S. 383, 397 (1988)).

Legislators felt this statute was a useful tool in helping stop individuals from engaging in conduct designed to mislead the public and commit election-related mischief under the guise of official status. Although legislators had no legal obligation to develop a record of the problem before adopting prophylactic legislation, their concerns were hardly theoretical. There were reports throughout the country of disreputable persons falsely claiming to be election officials in order to intimidate voters, interfere with the ballot collection process, or an array of other anti-social behavior. See, e.g., Elizabeth Jenney, Scammers Impersonate Election Officials in MD, Patch.com (Oct. 30, 2020), available at <https://patch.com/maryland/across-md/scammers-impersonate-election-officials-md-attorney-general>; City of Phoenix Alert on Election Impersonation (Aug. 12, 2015), available at <https://www.phoenix.gov/news/cityclerk/900>. In Kansas, legislators heard similar concerns from county election officials across the State.

It is hardly unreasonable for the State to require individuals engaging in voter registration and other educational activities to take certain, minimal steps to ensure that voters do not confuse such activists with election officials (e.g., by wearing a button, hat, or other clothing generally identifying whom they represent or at least whom they do not represent). Likewise, it is not too much to ask that they not include official county logos on mailings or other communications without also including a disclaimer of non-official status. These are not significant burdens. The statute does not prevent Plaintiffs from actually engaging in any communicative activity; the only thing it does is prevent them from misrepresenting themselves as election officials in their work, which is unequivocally not something they have any constitutional right to do. That easily satisfies any constitutional scrutiny.

To suggest, as Plaintiffs do (Pet. ¶ 4), that they are at risk of prosecution “even when they explicitly state that they are not elections officials [because sometimes] voters nevertheless come to the erroneous conclusion” is preposterous. Plaintiffs have attempted to manufacture a non-existent crisis that has absolutely zero connection to reality. The effort may be consistent with Plaintiffs’ partisan agenda, but it is not supported by any legislative actions. Plaintiffs’ proposed construction of the statute is unreasonable and at odds with how the Court must interpret statutes when their constitutionality has been challenged.

b. – Existence of Other Impersonation Statute Does Not Aid Plaintiffs

As Plaintiffs rightly point out, Kansas already punishes the impersonation of election officials through a statute that has been on the books for more than a decade. See Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-5917(a) (“False impersonation is representing oneself to be a public officer, public employee or a person licensed to practice or engage in any profession or vocation for which a license is required by the laws of the state of Kansas, with knowledge that such representation is false”). A violation is punishable as a class B nonperson misdemeanor, id. § 21-5917(b), which carries a maximum sentence of six months’ jail time and a $1,000 fine.

Oddly, Plaintiffs seem to think that the existence of Section 21-5917(a) somehow aids their case against the new impersonation statute on the theory that the presence of the former renders the latter non-narrowly tailored. (Pet. ¶ 111). There is no merit to this argument. For one thing, the new statute does not impact, let alone target, Plaintiffs’ core speech rights and thus does not need to undergo exacting judicial scrutiny. Moreover, the idea that election-related criminal penalties currently on the books represent a baseline above which a legislature cannot go without justifying to a court why such greater sanction is necessary is fundamentally at odds with the separation of powers among the coordinate branches. A court simply has no warrant to second-guess legislative activity on that ground. The U.S. Supreme Court has likewise held that it does not require an “elaborate, empirical verification of the weightiness of the State’s asserted justifications” for electoral regulations. Timmons v. Twin Cities Area New Party, 520 U.S. 351, 364 (1997). Earlier this month, in fact, the Supreme Court squarely reaffirmed that “a State may take action to prevent election fraud without waiting for it to occur and be detected within its own borders.” Brnovich v. Democratic Nat’l Comm., ___ S. Ct. ___, Nos. 19-1257 and 19-1258, 2021 WL 2690267, at *20 (U.S. July 1, 2021); accord Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 195 (1986) (“Legislatures . . . should be permitted to respond to potential deficiencies in the electoral process with foresight rather than reactively.”); id. (“State’s political system [need not] sustain some level of damage before the legislature [can] take corrective action.”).

The new election official impersonation statute is a reasonable prophylactic measure that was designed to enhance the integrity of the electoral process by preventing individuals from misleading members of the public about such process while falsely conveying an air of authority as they misrepresent themselves as election officials. Legislators passed this statute because, inter alia, they heard repeatedly from county election officials across the state that many voters were receiving official-looking letters containing confusing and/or inaccurate information about critical electoral matters (e.g., registration, ballot application issues, voting times and procedures, etc.), generating significant confusion among the electorate. The letters often contained at least a hint of official status imprimatur, a tactic no doubt designed by their architects to create a sense of urgency among voters. Other nefarious individuals and/or organizations also hosted official-sounding websites – with the names of key election officials prominently mentioned therein – that asked voters to complete information for advance ballots. Legislators were concerned that, if the literature and/or websites suggested that they came from election officials and not private organizations, there would be likely voter confusion and a compromising of election integrity (not to mention, incidentally, the potential for information harvesting that the voters did not intend to provide). Legislators also learned from numerous county election officials that voters were often receiving multiple advance ballot applications and felt obliged to complete them, wreaking even more chaos. Election officials reported that voters were sending in multiple (i.e., duplicate) advance ballot applications; some were submitted by the voters themselves while others were submitted on their behalf by third-party organizations. The legislature’s desire to negate, or at least minimize, the potential problems in this area was indisputably within their constitutional authority and the means they adopted to do so did not cross any constitutional boundaries.

2. – Overbreadth (Count IV)

Plaintiffs next claim that the election official impersonation statute is unconstitutionally overbroad by restricting a substantial amount of constitutionally protected speech.” (Pet. ¶ 209). The new law, they aver, “would ban virtually all voter assistance, education, and encouragement activities that Plaintiffs engage in, and there is no way to separate out which activities are constitutional from those that are unconstitutional.” (Id. at ¶ 210). This cause of action is wholly implausible.

A litigant challenging a statute as overbroad bears the burden of establishing that (1) constitutionally protected activity is a significant part of the statute’s target, and (2) there is no satisfactory method to sever the statute’s constitutional applications from its unconstitutional applications. Matter of A.B., 484 P.3d at 232 (citing State v. Boettger, 310 Kan. 800, 804, 450 P.3d 805 (2019)). The overbreadth doctrine is “strong medicine” and thus must be applied “with hesitation, and then only as a last resort.” New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 769 (1982); accord State v. Martens, 279 Kan. 242, 253, 106 P.3d 28 (2005) (“The overbreadth doctrine should be employed sparingly and only as a last resort.”).

The impersonation statute at issue here is simply not targeted at constitutionally protected speech. The law is intended to protect the integrity of the electoral process. It does so in large part by safeguarding against the deception of members of the public about voting procedures and processes by persons who knowingly misrepresent themselves as election officials and thereby attempt to confuse the citizenry with a false veneer of official status. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that, in such circumstances, where there is a legally cognizable harm potentially flowing from the false statements, such statements are not protected. See United States v. Alvarez, 567

U.S. 709, 721 (2012) (“Statutes that prohibit falsely representing that one is speaking on behalf of the Government, or that prohibit impersonating a Government officer, also protect the integrity of Government processes, quite apart from merely restricting false speech.”); see also Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 171 (1979) (“Spreading false information in and of itself carries no First Amendment credentials.”); cf. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 340 (1974) (“There is no constitutional value in false statements of fact.”). Moreover, as described in detail above, as long as Plaintiffs do not knowingly engage in conduct designed to falsely convey the impression that they are election officials, the statute is not violated in any event.

To the extent that Plaintiffs believe their actions (rather than their words) might convey a misleading impression about their status to persons with whom they interact, their free speech rights diminish as well. See Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 124 (2003) (“Rarely, if ever, will an overbreadth challenge succeed against a law or regulation that is not specifically addressed to speech or to conduct necessarily associated with speech (such as picketing or demonstrating).”)

Even if the Court somehow concludes that the criminal impersonation statute is directed at constitutionally protected speech, and even if it further concludes that the statute’s focus is on the subjective views of the listener rather than the knowing objectives of the speaker, the statute can still be interpreted to avoid running afoul of any constitutional mandate. “A statute which is facially overbroad may be authoritatively construed and restricted to cover only conduct which is not constitutionally protected and, so construed, the statute will thereafter be immune from attack on the grounds of overbreadth.” State v. Thompson, 237 Kan. 562, 564, 701 P.2d 694 (1985). All the Court need do is require, as the statute already implicitly does, that the speaker intend to give the false impression that he/she is an election official.

Plaintiffs argued in their motion for a temporary injunction that such a construction is impermissible because it would effectively rewrite the statute. They maintained that reading an intent component into the new law would render subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) redundant of subsection (a)(1). Not so. Subsection (a)(1) is directed at actors who explicitly claim (falsely) to be an election official, whereas subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) are targeted at individuals who engage in more indirect and/or subtle conduct designed to create a false appearance of election official status. And an intent element is already inherent in the statute. To the extent that there is any ambiguity on the issue – and Defendants do not believe there is – the rule of lenity would further protect Plaintiffs. See State v. Chavez, 292 Kan. 464, 468, 254 P.3d 539 (2011) (“When there is reasonable doubt about the statute’s meaning, we apply the rule of lenity and give the statute a narrow construction.”). Plus, the presence of redundancies in a statute (if that even is true here) is hardly a unique scenario and certainly does nothing to undermine the statute’s guidelines for fair and impartial enforcement. What the overbreadth doctrine does not allow, however, is – as Plaintiffs have proposed – for a court to adopt the most uncharitable reading of a statute possible and then strike down the statute altogether.

Finally, even assuming there are some circumstances in which the statute might sweep in some constitutionally protected speech, that is not a basis for striking down the statute pursuant to an overbreadth theory. “In order to maintain an appropriate balance, [the Supreme Court has] vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute’s overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep.” United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 292 (2008) (emphasis in original). In other words, the mere fact that some impermissible applications of a law may be conceivable does not render that law unconstitutionally overbroad; there must be a realistic danger that the law will significantly compromise recognized free speech protections. This is particularly true where, as is the case here, conduct and not merely speech is involved. State v. Williams, 299 Kan. 911, 920 P.3d 400 (2014). In this lawsuit, even if it is possible to conceive of hypothetical scenarios where Plaintiff's speech interests might be implicated at the margins, the impact is certainly not so substantial as to necessitate the wholesale invalidation of a statute directed at the plainly legitimate purpose of preserving the integrity of the State's electoral process.

3. – Vagueness (Count V)

Plaintiffs also claim that the election official impersonation statute is unconstitutionally vague. (Pet. ¶¶ 215-18). A claim that a statute is void for vagueness requires a court to interpret the statutory text in order “to determine whether it gives adequate warning as to the proscribed conduct.” State v. Jenkins, 311 Kan. 39, 52, 455 P.3d 779 (2020) (quoting State v. Richardson, 289 Kan. 118, 124, 209 P.3d 696 (2009)). The “[v]agueness doctrine is an outgrowth not of the First Amendment, but of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.” Williams, 553 U.S. at 304. Indeed, “[d]ue process requires criminal statutes to convey a sufficiently definite warning as to the conduct proscribed when measured by common understanding and practice.” Jenkins, 311 Kan. at 53 (quotation omitted). At its core, “the test for vagueness is a commonsense determination of fundamental fairness.” Richardson, 289 Kan. at 124.

Our Supreme Court has held that “the determinative question” when statutes are attacked on constitutional vagueness grounds is “whether a person of ordinary intelligence understands what conduct is prohibited by the statutory language at issue.” Id. at 125 (quotation omitted). A two-pronged inquiry is employed in conducting this assessment: the Court asks “(1) whether the statute gives fair warning to those potentially subject to it; and (2) whether it adequately guards against arbitrary and unreasonable enforcement.” Jenkins, 311 Kan. 53 (quotation omitted).

With regard to the first prong, Plaintiffs argue that the statute focuses entirely on others’ subjective perceptions, thus making it impossible for Plaintiffs to know if they might be violating the law. This contention totally ignores the statutory text. The statute’s prohibitions target only the conduct of the speaker, not the subjective views of the listener. The statute’s reach is likewise limited to actions by the speaker in which he/she knowingly engaged in actions designed to convey the false impression that he/she is an election official. Admittedly, “the need for clarity of definition and the prevention of arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement is heightened for criminal statutes.” Richardson, 289 Kan. at 125. But absent the requisite intent – which simply will not exist here if Plaintiffs are exercising the kind of caution they claim to embrace in their Petition – there would be no reasonable basis for a prosecution and there would be no legitimate threat whatsoever that one would occur.

Moreover, the Kansas Supreme Court has regularly held that a challenged statute “comes before the court cloaked in a presumption of constitutionality.” Leiker v. Gafford, 245 Kan. 325, 363-64, 778 P.2d 823 (1989). As the Court underscored earlier this year in turning away a constitutional challenge to a criminal statute on vagueness and overbreadth grounds, “This court presumes that statutes are constitutional and resolves all doubts in favor of passing constitutional muster. If there is any reasonable way to construe a statute as constitutionally valid, this court has both the authority and duty to engage in such a construction.” Matter of A.B., 484 P.3d 226, 230 (2021) (quoting State v. Bollinger, 302 Kan. 309, 318, 352 P.3d 1003 (2015)). The party challenging the statute has the burden of proving that the law clearly violates the constitution.

Leiker, 245 Kan. at 363-64. This burden “is a ‘weighty’ one.” Downtown Bar & Grill, 294 Kan. at 192. Plaintiffs have not come even close to meeting that standard here.

As for the second prong of the void-for-vagueness test, it is difficult to see how there can be arbitrary enforcement of this impersonation statute. Plaintiffs suggest that the new law gives law enforcement officials arbitrary discretion to pick and choose who might be prosecuted under its provisions. (Pet. ¶¶ 216-17). This contention crumbles at the touch. The statutory text itself provides contours for, and cabins the discretion of, law enforcement charged with enforcing this new law. Naturally, as is true of every criminal case, the underlying facts will dictate whether a prosecution should be pursued and whether a defendant should be adjudged guilty. But “[w]hat renders a statute vague is not the possibility that it will sometimes be difficult to determine whether the incriminating fact it establishes has been proved; but rather the indeterminacy of precisely what that fact is.” Williams, 553 U.S. at 306.

“Words inevitably contain germs of uncertainty,” Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 608 (1973), and legislation is rarely as precise as citizens, judges, or even lawmakers would like it to be, particularly when it emerges from the rough-and-tumble nature of the legislative process. See League of Women Voters of Fla. v. Browning, 575 F. Supp.2d 1298, 1318 (S.D. Fla. 2008) (rejecting vagueness challenge to voter registration statute). The U.S. Supreme Court, however, has held that “perfect clarity and precise guidance have never been required even of regulations that restrict expressive activity.” Williams, 553 U.S. at 304 (citation omitted); accord Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 110 (1972) (“Condemned to the use of words, we can never expect mathematical certainty from our language.”); Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104, 110 (1972) (Vagueness doctrine is not meant to “convert into a constitutional dilemma the practical difficulties in drawing criminal statutes both general enough to take into account a variety of human conduct and sufficiently specific to provide fair warning that certain kinds of conduct are prohibited. Nor will statutes be “automatically invalidated simply because difficulty is found in determining whether certain marginal offenses fall within their language.” Jenkins, 311 Kan. at 53. The applicable standard “is not one of wholly consistent academic definition of abstract terms. It is, rather, the practical criterion of fair notice to those to whom the statute is directed.” Browning, 575 F. Supp.2d at 1318 (quoting Am. Commc’ns Ass’n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 412 (1950)).

Numerous statutes have survived facial vagueness challenges by the U.S. Supreme Court despite containing arguably ambiguous language. See, e.g., Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 732 (2000) (rejecting vagueness challenge to ordinance making it a crime to “approach” another person, without his/her “consent,” to engage in “oral protest, education, or counseling” within specified distance of health-care facility); Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 332 (1988) (rejecting vagueness challenge to ordinance interpreted as regulating conduct near embassies “when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present”); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611, 616 (1968) (rejecting vagueness challenge to ordinance prohibiting protests that “unreasonably interfere” with access to public buildings); Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 79 (1949) (rejecting vagueness challenge to sound ordinance forbidding “loud and raucous” sound amplification).

In sum, when measured against the yardstick of “ordinary intelligence,” i.e., an “ordinary person exercising ordinary common sense,” Browning, 575 F. Supp.2d at 1319, the new criminal impersonation statute unquestionably establishes sufficiently clear guidelines for enforcement to avoid the type of arbitrary and discriminatory application that can, in rare circumstances, render a statute void for vagueness. This claim must be dismissed.

C. – Absentee Ballot Signature Verification Requirements Are Not Constitutionally Suspect

The second voter integrity provision that Plaintiffs challenge in this case is the absentee ballot signature verification mandate in H.B. 2183, § 5(h). (Pet. ¶¶ 68-72, 122-47). The new law provides as follows:

Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), no county election officer shall accept an advance voting ballot transmitted by mail unless the county election officer verifies that the signature of the person on the advance voting ballot envelope matches the signature on file in the county voter registration records, except that verification of the voter's signature shall not be required if a voter has a disability preventing the voter from signing the ballot or preventing the voter from having a signature consistent with such voter's registration form. Signature verification may occur by electronic device or by human inspection. In the event that the signature of a person on the advance voting ballot envelope does not match the signature on file in the county voter registration records, the ballot shall not be counted.

H.B. 2183, § 5(h). Plaintiffs claim that the new requirement is unnecessary, unreliable, and lacks proper standards to ensure uniformity across counties. They argue that it imposes such a severe burden on voters as to amount to disenfranchisement, in violation of the right to vote protected by Article V of the Kansas Constitution as well as Sections 1-2 of the Kansas Constitution's Bill of Rights (Count II). They further claim the lack of uniform standard contravenes voters' equal protection rights under those same state constitutional provisions (Count III). Finally, they argue the lack of procedures violates their rights to due process in contravention of Section 18 of the Kansas Constitution's Bill of Rights (Count VI). None of these claims have a scintilla of merit.

1. – Right to Vote (Count II)

Although signature verifications have not even been applied yet, having only taken effect less than two weeks ago, Plaintiffs wildly speculate that the new law “is certain to disenfranchise lawful Kansas voters” who opt to vote via advance ballot. (Pet. ¶ 123). They claim that verification by laypersons is inherently unreliable, making mistakes inevitable. (Id. at ¶¶ 125-35). Despite the fact that the statute expressly exempts disabled individuals from this requirement to the extent they have “a disability preventing the voter from signing the ballot or preventing the voter from having a signature consistent with such voter’s registration form,” Plaintiffs insist this exemption is inadequate to “ameliorate the burdens imposed” on such persons. (Id. at ¶ 136). Although the statute further mandates a cure mechanism under which the county election office must “attempt to contact each person who submits an advance voting ballot where there is no signature or where the signature does not match with the signature on file and allow such voter the opportunity to correct the deficiency before the commencement of the final county canvass,” H.B. 2183, § 5(b), Plaintiffs cynically aver that “there is no guarantee that such voters will be actually contacted, and even when they are, virtually every aspect of that contact and any opportunity to cure are left to the discretion of county election officials.” (Pet. ¶ 144). Under the governing legal standard, none of these allegations are sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss.

The parties here agree that Plaintiffs’ right to vote claim is controlled by the Anderson-Burdick test described in detail in Part III.B.1, and virtually every court to consider constitutional attacks on election-related signature verification requirements has flatly rejected such causes of action. See, e.g., Richardson v. Texas Sec’y of State, 978 F.3d 220 (5th Cir. 2020); Memphis A.

Philip Randolph Inst. v. Hargett, 978 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2020); Lemons v. Bradbury, 538 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2008); League of Women Voters v. LaRose, 489 F. Supp.3d 719 (S.D. Ohio 2020); Howard County Citizens for Open Gov't v. Howard County Bd. of Elections, 30 A.2d 245 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 2011).

a. – The Signature Verification Requirement Does Not Severely Burden Plaintiffs' Right to Vote

With regard to the burden of the signature verification requirement on Plaintiffs and their members, to the extent one exists at all, it is extremely de minimis. As the Fifth Circuit recently observed:

Signature-verification requirements, like photo-ID requirements, help to ensure the veracity of a ballot by identifying eligible voters. Signature-verification requirements are even less burdensome than photo-ID requirements, as they do not require a voter to secure or to assemble any documentation. True, some voters may have difficulty signing their names on ballots. But in Crawford, even though some voters might find it difficult either to secure a copy of their birth certificate or to assemble the other required documentation to obtain a state-issued identification, that difficulty did not render the photo-ID law a severe burden on the right to vote.

Even if some voters have trouble duplicating their signatures, that problem is neither so serious nor so frequent as to raise any question about the constitutionality of the signature-verification requirement. No citizen has a Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from the usual burdens of voting. And mail-in ballot rules that merely make casting a ballot more inconvenient for some voters are not constitutionally suspect.

Richardson, 978 F.3d at 236-37 (quoting Crawford, 553 U.S. 181 (2008)) (internal alternations omitted). Kansas also mitigates any potential burden the new signature verification requirement might impose on voters in a number of ways. First, the State mandates – by statute – that county election officials contact any voter whose advance ballot appears to contain a signature mismatch (or lack of signature) and give that an individual an opportunity to cure the deficiency. H.B.

2183, § 5(b). Second, the statute exempts disabled individuals from its reach to the extent their disability prevents them from signing the ballot or having a verifiable signature on file with the county election office. Id. § 5(h). Third, directly refuting much of Plaintiffs' claimed harms, the statute allows any voter who has an illness or disability preventing him/her from signing the ballot to request assistance from some third-party in marking the ballot. Id. § 5(c), (e). Fourth, for individuals who are concerned that they will be unable to provide a matching signature, the State allows them to vote in person either on Election Day itself or during the extensive advance voting period. These mitigation measures remove any doubt that the supposed burdens on voting Plaintiffs claim are nothing more than fanciful conjecture with little nexus to reality. Identical measures in other states have been deemed sufficient to render ballot signature verification requirements a non-severe burden. See Richardson, 978 F.3d at 237; Hargett, 978 F.3d at 388.

Furthermore, as the Supreme Court recently held, the proper judicial inquiry is not on the burden to a handful of individual voters who might be adversely affected by the statute; it is, rather, on the electorate "as a whole." Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *17. Reinforcing this point in turning away a constitutional challenge to a signature verification law similar to the one here, the Fifth Circuit noted, "If the Court were 'to deem ordinary and widespread burdens like these severe' based solely on their impact on a small number of voters, we 'would subject virtually every electoral regulation to strict scrutiny, hamper the ability of States to run efficient and equitable elections, and compel federal courts to rewrite state electoral codes.'" Richardson, 978 F.3d at 236 (quoting Clingman v. Beaver, 544 U.S. 581, 593 (2005)). There is no legitimate basis for disputing that Kansas' signature verification requirement is no more burdensome on the right to vote than was the photo-ID mandate upheld by the Supreme Court in Crawford. Indeed, Plaintiffs cannot possibly show any burden – let alone a severe burden – because the law has not even been deployed. In short, the new law is a reasonable and nondiscriminatory restriction on the right to vote.

b. – Kansas’ Signature Verification Requirement Is Amply Justified by the State’s Strong Regulatory Interests

The next prong of the Anderson-Burdick test looks to the State’s regulatory interests in the challenged statute. Where, as is the case here, the burdens on voting are not severe, the law is subjected to a highly deferential rational basis review, and “the State’s important regulatory interests are generally sufficient to justify the restrictions.” Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434. This only makes sense given that, “as a practical matter, there must be a substantial regulation of elections if they are to be fair and honest and if some sort of order, rather than chaos, is to accompany the democratic process.” Id. at 433 (quoting Storer v. Brown, 415 U.S. 724, 730 (1974)).

Kansas has a number of well-recognized interests in requiring that signatures on mailed-in advance ballots be verified before they will be counted. The primary regulatory interest is in avoiding fraud. As the Supreme Court recently observed, although “every voting rule imposes a burden of some sort,” a “strong and entirely legitimate state interest is the prevention of fraud. Fraud can affect the outcome of a close election, and fraudulent votes dilute the right of citizens to cast ballots that carry appropriate weight. Fraud can also undermine public confidence in the fairness of elections and the perceived legitimacy of the announced outcome.” Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *13. The risk of voter fraud is particularly acute with mail-in voting. See, e.g., Crawford, 553 U.S. at 195-96 (“flagrant examples of [voter] fraud . . . have been documented throughout this Nation’s history by respected historians and journalists, and . . . Indiana’s own experience with fraudulent voting in the 2003 Democratic primary for East Chicago Mayor – though perpetrated using absentee ballots and not in-person fraud – demonstrate that not only is the risk of voter fraud real but that it could affect the outcome of a close election.”); Richardson, 978 F.3d at 239 (“Texas’s signature-verification requirement is not designed to stymie voter fraud only in the abstract. It seeks to stop voter fraud where the problem is most acute – in the context of mail-in voting.”); Comm’n on Fed. Elections Reform, Building Confidence in U.S. Elections (“Baker-Carter Commission”), Building Confidence in U.S. Elections 46 (Sept. 2005) (“Absentee ballots remain the largest source of potential voter fraud.”).

Plaintiffs take the Legislature to task for not providing “evidence of fraud or other issues that would support requiring signature matching in any of the counties, much less statewide.” (Pet. ¶¶ 71, 194). But there is no such requirement:

[W]e do not force states to shoulder the burden of demonstrating empirically the objective effects of election laws. States may respond to potential deficiencies in the electoral process with foresight rather than reactively. States have thus never been required to justify their prophylactic measures to decrease occasions for voter fraud.

Richardson, 978 F.3d at 240 (quoting Munro, 479 U.S. at 195-96, and Tex. LULAC v. Hughs, 978 F.3d 136, 147 (5th Cir. 2020)); accord Timmons, 520 U.S. at 364 (“Nor do we require elaborate, empirical verification of the weightiness of the State’s asserted justifications.”)

In addition to preventing fraud, which safeguards the integrity of the electoral process, Kansas also has a powerful interest in promoting the orderly administration of all elections. This interest was expressly endorsed by the Supreme Court in Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186 (2010). The Court there noted:

[T]he State’s interest in preserving electoral integrity is not limited to combating fraud. That interest extends to efforts to ferret out invalid signatures caused not by fraud but by simple mistake, such as duplicate signatures or signatures of individuals who are not registered to vote in the State. That interest also extends more generally to promoting transparency and accountability in the electoral process, which the State argues is essential to the proper functioning of a democracy.

Id. at 198.

In sum, Plaintiffs have demonstrated no burden to voting whatsoever from the signature verification requirement. Nor could they possibly do so, other than resorting to rank speculation (which is all they have done here) given that the law only took effect less than two weeks ago and has not yet been used in a single election. Even if they could show that some voters' mailed-in ballots were rejected due to a signature mismatch and that the cure opportunities in the law proved inadequate for those individuals, the burden on the electorate "as a whole" would still be minimal. And the State's regulatory interests are strong enough to easily outweigh such burden under the rational basis review dictated by Anderson-Burdick. That these Plaintiffs might have adopted a different law or drawn up a different regulatory scheme is beside the point. What Plaintiffs are ultimately asking the Court to do is to micromanage Kansas' electoral regulatory scheme and second-guess the Legislature's policy decisions. That is not the Court's role. Plaintiffs' Count II with respect to the signature verification requirements must be dismissed.

2. – Equal Protection (Count III)

Plaintiffs further attack the signature verification mandate on equal protection grounds, claiming that the lack of standards for judging signatures confers too much discretion on election officials and provides no uniformity for each of the State's 105 counties. (Pet. ¶¶ 69-70). They suggest that accurate signature matching is a difficult task often susceptible to error. (Id. at ¶¶ 126-31). Citing Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000), they maintain that the law's allowance of no, or at least different, standards in counties across the State violates their equal protection rights under the Kansas Constitution. (Pet. ¶¶ 203-05).

The Ninth Circuit rejected a similar constitutional challenge to a signature verification regulatory scheme in Lemons, 538 F.3d at 1105-07. The court of appeals noted that the Supreme Court went to great lengths in Bush to underscore the narrow scope of its ruling (“limited to the present circumstances”) and had found an Equal Protection Clause violation “only because it was a court-ordered recount.” Id. at 1106 (quoting Bush, 531 U.S. 106-07, 109) (emphasis added). In addition, the Ninth Circuit held that the requirement that referendum signatures be matched to an individual’s signature on file with the county registration office in and of itself represented a sufficiently uniform standard to survive an equal protection challenge. Id. The fact that a few signatures might have been rejected in error, meanwhile, was deemed to be little more than “isolated discrepancies” that did “not demonstrate the absence of a uniform standard.” Id. This ruling was hardly surprising. After all, elections in every state are ultimately administered by individual counties, and “[a]rguable differences in how elections boards apply uniform statewide standards to the innumerable permutations of ballot irregularities, although perhaps unfortunate, are to be expected.” N.E. Ohio Coalition for the Homeless v. Husted, 837 F.3d 612, 636 (6th Cir. 2016). It is also inevitable – human nature being what it is – that certain signature verifiers will do a better than job than others. But that is simply not constitutionally significant. See Lemons, 538 F.3d at 1107.

Given that the statute has not even been implemented yet, Plaintiffs have not, and cannot, allege any evidence of improperly rejected ballots. But even if they had adduced such evidence, the fact that similarly situated persons may be treated differently is not, in and of itself, sufficient to establish an equal protection violation. The law simply does not require absolute precision, nor does it mandate that all of Kansas' 105 counties employ identical standards on every jot and tittle of their election administration practices.⁵ Every state's electoral system is administered on a county-by-county basis. To suggest that de minimis deviations from one county to another – particularly on matters that involve human judgment and discretion – trigger Equal Protection Clause violations would be both unprecedented and revolutionary. It would, for example, totally upend the county canvassing procedures. Neither the federal nor the state constitution requires anything so radical.

It is also worth noting that signature verification requirements for advance ballots are hardly unknown in Kansas. Indeed, the State has long required voters to sign advance ballots before submitting them to a county election office. See Kan. Stat. Ann. § 25-1121(b). The recent legislative enactment simply requires that the signatures on ballots returned by mail be verified by matching the signature on the ballot with the signature on file in the county election office. Verification of advance ballot signature has always been recommended under the Kansas Election Standards Manual (prepared by the Secretary of State pursuant to his authority under Kan. Stat. Ann. § 25-1131).⁶ In fact, the Secretary of State has always required each county election office “to attempt to contact each person who submits an advance voting ballot where there is no signature, or where the signature does not match with the signature on file and allow the voter the opportunity to correct the deficiency prior to the meeting of the county board of canvassers.” The practice has been to make at least three attempted contacts with the voter. To suggest, therefore, that county election officials have no experience in administering a signature verification requirement is not accurate.

The bottom line is that Plaintiffs' equal protection attack on the signature verification requirements in H.B. 2183, § 5(h) has no merit and must be dismissed.

3. – Due Process (Count VI)

In their final effort to kill the signature verification requirement, Plaintiffs suggest that the law's failure "to provide any standard by which county election officials are to evaluate a voter's ballot" constitutes a violation of voters' due process rights. (Pet. ¶ 227). The flaw in this claim is that the right to vote does not implicate any property or liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause or its apparent analogue in Section 18 of our state constitution's bill of rights.⁷ "In the absence of a protected property or liberty interest, there can be no due process violation." Landmark Nat'l Bank v. Kesler, 289 Kan. 528, 544 216 P.3d 158 (2009) (citing State ex rel. Tomasic v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte County/Kansas City, 265 Kan. 779, 809, 962 P.2d 543 (1998)).

At least with respect to the federal Constitution, a "liberty interest may arise from the Constitution itself, by reason of guarantees implicit in the word 'liberty,' or it may arise from an expectation of interest created by state laws or policies." Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209, 221

⁷ Whereas the U.S. Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment directs that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," Section 18 of the Kansas Constitution's Bill of Rights merely states that "[a]ll persons, for injuries suffered in person, reputation or property, shall have remedy by due course of law, and justice administered without delay." Nowhere is a liberty interest mentioned in the Kansas Constitution. The Kansas Supreme Court does not appear to have squarely dealt with a challenge to the scope of this clause, no doubt because most litigants bring claims on behalf of both the U.S. Constitution and the Kansas Constitution. Eager to avoid the assertion of any federal claims and the removal of this case to federal court, however, Plaintiffs have assiduously avoided any reference to the U.S. Constitution's Due Process Clause. Because the right to vote does not entail a liberty interest at all, Defendants will simply assume, arguendo, a liberty component is part of the state constitution for purposes of this motion to dismiss.

(2005). Liberty interests arising out of the U.S. Constitution encompass “the right to contract, to engage in the common occupations of life, to gain useful knowledge, to marry and establish a home to bring up children, to worship God, and to enjoy those privileges long recognized as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness.” Richardson, 978 F.3d at 230 (quoting Bd. of Regents of State Colls. v. Roth, 408 U.S. 546, 572 (1972)). State-created liberty interests, on the other hand, are “generally limited to freedom from restraint.” Id. (quoting Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, 484 (1995)).

While the right to vote may be a fundamental right implicating, for example, the Equal Protection Clause, it is not a constitutionally-protected liberty interest. Id. at 231; accord New Ga. Project v. Raffensperger, 976 F.3d 1278, 1282 (11th Cir. 2020); League of Women Voters v. Brunner, 548 F.3d 463, 479 (6th Cir. 2008). And invoking a liberty interest in the context of a signature verification requirement is even more of a stretch. Having held that there is not even a constitutional right to vote via absentee ballot, see McDonald v. Bd. of Election Comm’rs of Chicago, 394 U.S. 802, 807-09 (1969), it is unfathomable that the Supreme Court would find a liberty interest in avoiding signature verification requirements in connection with such ballots. In short, Plaintiffs’ due process rights are not at stake here and this claim must be dismissed.⁸

D. – Ballot Harvesting/Delivery Restrictions are Not Unconstitutional

In their splatter-approach Petition, Plaintiffs next take aim at the State’s new restrictions on ballot harvesting, misrepresented as a “Delivery Assistance Ban.” (Pet. ¶¶ 148-162). This election integrity measure, H.B. 2183, § 2, requires that any person delivering an advance ballot of some other person to a county election office or polling place must submit a written statement on a form prescribed by the Secretary of State that contains attestations from the voter and the delivery agent that no undue influence was exercised on the voter. Id. § 2(a). The statute further restricts individuals from transmitting to a county election office or polling place more than ten advance voting ballots during any particular election. Id. § 2(c). Plaintiffs claim that the new law contravenes their freedom of speech and association (Count I) as well as their right to vote (Count II).

Although Plaintiffs argue that their free speech/association cause of action is subject to “exacting scrutiny” because core political speech is being targeted (Pet. ¶¶ 180-84), this theory falls flat. Ballot collection restrictions simply do not target speech or even expressive conduct. The law in no way prohibits Plaintiffs from engaging in any interactions with voters regarding advance ballots. Plaintiffs are entirely free to encourage voters to request an advance ballot, to provide a website link or other education about how to return advance ballots, and to underscore the importance of voting (by whatever means). The only thing being restricted under this statute is the specific conduct of delivering a third-party’s ballot to election officials. “[C]ompleting a ballot request for another voter, and collecting and returning ballots of another voter, do not communicate any particular message. Those actions are not expressive, and are not subject to strict scrutiny.” DCCC v. Ziriak, 487 F. Supp.3d 1207, 1235 (N.D. Okla. 2020); accord Knox v. Brnovich, 907 F.3d 1167, 1181 (9th Cir. 2018) (rejecting argument that the act of collecting early ballots is expressive conduct that conveys any message about voting; concluding that this type of conduct cannot reasonably be construed “as conveying a symbolic message of any sort”); Lichtenstein, 489 F. Supp.3d at 765-77 (same); New Ga. Project, 487 F. Supp.3d at 1300-02 (same); Steen, 732 F.3d at 393 (collecting voter registrations is not protected speech). As the party invoking the First Amendment (or, as relevant here, its Kansas Constitution counterpart), Plaintiffs have the burden of proving its applicability, Clark v. Cmty. For Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 n.5 (1984), and they simply cannot do so.

Plaintiffs' constitutional challenges to the ballot collection restrictions in Counts I and II, therefore, are properly analyzed under the Anderson-Burdick standard set forth above. Plaintiffs contend that the law's restrictions will have an adverse impact on the State's "most vulnerable citizens" who purportedly have a great need for "ballot collection and delivery assistance." (Pet. ¶ 149). While the premise of this theory is highly condescending to those communities, and it is entirely speculative whether certain segments of the population actually use ballot collection assistance in statistically significant greater numbers than others, those issues are ultimately irrelevant because the claim still fails as a legal matter.

First, any burden on voting from the ballot harvesting restrictions in H.B. 2183, § 2 (to the extent there is one) is extremely minimal. Putting a stamp on an advance ballot envelope is hardly so great a hardship as to trigger constitutional protections. If, as the Supreme Court held, having to travel to the local DMV office to obtain a voter ID "does not qualify as a substantial burden on the right to vote, or even represent a significant increase over the usual burdens of voting," Crawford, 553 U.S. at 198, then surely requiring a voter to mail in his/her own advance ballot does not contravene the Constitution. Of course, the Kansas statute does not even require that; it simply limits the number of ballots that any one person can collect and deliver from other individuals. Moreover, as the Supreme Court held less than two weeks ago in repudiating a legal challenge to a ballot harvesting law in Arizona far more restrictive than the Kansas version (the Arizona statute does not allow any third-party collection/delivery), the relevant judicial inquiry is on the burden to the electorate “as a whole,” not on the burden to a handful of individual voters who might be adversely affected by the statute. See Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *17; see also id. at *13 (“[E]ven neutral regulations, no matter how crafted, may well result in some predictable disparities in rates of voting and noncompliance with voting rules. But the mere fact there is some disparity in impact does not necessarily mean that a system is not equally open or that it does not give everyone an equal opportunity to vote.”).

A state is not required to allow any absentee voting at all. McDonald, 394 U.S. at 809. By choosing to offer such a feature, therefore, a state has “increase[d] options, not restrictions.” Tex. Democratic Party v. Abbott, 961 F.3d 389, 415 (5th Cir. 2020) (Ho, J., concurring). “Of course, there will always be other voters for whom, through no fault of the state, getting to the polls is difficult or even impossible. But . . . that is a matter of personal hardship, not state action. For courts to intervene, a voter must show that the state has in fact precluded voters from voting – that the voter has been prohibited from voting by the State.” Id. (cleaned up) (quoting McDonald, 394 U.S. at 808 & n.7, 810).

In any event, when a state invokes its constitutional authority to regulate elections to ensure that they are fair and orderly, the resulting restrictions will “inevitably affect – at least to some degree – the individual’s right to vote and his right to associate with others for political ends.” Anderson, 460 U.S. at 788. But these burdens “must necessarily accommodate a state’s legitimate interest in providing order, stability, and legitimacy to the electoral process.” Utah Republican Party, 892 F.3d at 1077. That is why a state’s “important regulatory interests are generally sufficient to justify reasonable, non-discriminatory restrictions” on election procedures. Anderson, 460 U.S. at 789.

The State's restrictions on third-parties' collection and delivery of advance ballots are rooted in extremely strong interests of combating voter fraud and facilitating public confidence in the election process. To quote the Supreme Court's recent decision in Brnovich:

"A State indisputably has a compelling interest in preserving the integrity of its election process." Purcell v. Gonzalez, 549 U.S. 1, 4 (2006) (per curiam) (internal quotation marks omitted). Limiting the classes of persons who may handle early ballots to those less likely to have ulterior motives deters potential fraud and improves voter confidence. That was the view of the bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform chaired by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker. The Carter-Baker Commission noted that "[a]bsentee balloting is vulnerable to abuse in several ways: . . . Citizens who vote at home, at nursing homes, at the workplace, or in church are more susceptible to pressure, overt and subtle, or to intimidation." Report of the Comm'n on Fed. Election Reform, Building Confidence in U.S. Elections 46 (Sept. 2005).

The Commission warned that "[v]ote buying schemes are far more difficult to detect when citizens vote by mail," and it recommended that "States therefore should reduce the risks of fraud and abuse in absentee voting by prohibiting 'third-party' organizations, candidates, and political party activists from handling absentee ballots." Ibid. The Commission ultimately recommended that States limit the classes of persons who may handle absentee ballots to "the voter, an acknowledged family member, the U.S. Postal Service or other legitimate shipper, or election officials." Id., at 47. [The Arizona law] is even more permissive in that it also authorizes ballot-handling by a voter's household member and caregiver.

* * *

The Court of Appeals thought that the State's justifications . . . were tenuous in large part because there was no evidence that fraud in connection with early ballots had occurred in Arizona. . . . But prevention of fraud is not the only legitimate interest served by restrictions on ballot collection. As the Carter-Baker Commission recognized, third-party ballot collection can lead to pressure and intimidation. And it should go without saying that a State may take action to prevent election fraud without waiting for it to occur and be detected within its own borders. [The Voting Rights Act] Section 2's command that the political processes remain equally open surely does not demand that "a State's political system sustain some level of damage before the legislature [can] take corrective action." Munro v. Socialist Workers Party, 479 U.S. 189, 195 (1986). Fraud is a real risk that accompanies mail-in voting even if Arizona had the good fortune to avoid it. Election fraud has had serious consequences in other States. For example, the North Carolina Board of Elections invalidated the results of a 2018 race for a seat in the House of Representatives for evidence of fraudulent mail-in ballots. The Arizona Legislature was not obligated to wait for something similar to happen closer to home.

Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *19-20 (final alteration in original); see also von Spakovsky, Vote Harvesting: A Recipe for Intimidation, Coercion, and Election Fraud, Heritage Foundation (Oct. 8, 2019), available at <https://www.heritage.org/election-integrity/report/vote-harvesting-recipe-intimidation-coercion-and-election-fraud>.

Considering the State's unequivocally strong interest in restricting the potential mischief that can accompany advance ballots, particularly when ballots are returned to election officials by individuals other than the voters themselves, any balancing required by Anderson-Burdick must be resolved in favor of the State. Even if the plaintiffs could somehow show a disparate burden on certain groups, the State's justifications in avoiding voter fraud would more than suffice to uphold the law. See Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *19; accord DCCC, 487 F. Supp.3d at 1235; New Ga. Project, 484 F. Supp.3d at 1299-1300. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' constitutional challenges to this law under Counts I and II must be dismissed.

E. The Ban on Mailing Advance Mail Voting Applications Does Not Violate the Constitution

Plaintiffs next challenge H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(1)'s the ban on out-of-state persons or entities mailing advance mail voting applications to Kansas residents, which they misleadingly label an "Advocacy Ban." (Pet. ¶¶ 113–121). Specifically, they allege the statute's prohibition on such mailings violates their freedom of speech and association rights (Count I), is unconstitutionally overbroad (Count IV), and is unconstitutionally vague (Count V).

1. Plaintiffs Challenges to H.B. 2332 § 3(D)(1) are Not Ripe

As a threshold matter, the Court lacks jurisdiction even to reach the merits of these claims because none of them are ripe for review. Ripeness is a justiciability doctrine “designed to prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements.” Shipe v. Public Wholesale Water Supply Dist. No. 25, 289 Kan. 160, 170, 210 P.3d 105 (2009) (quoting Nat’l Park Hospitality Ass’n v. Dep’t of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 807 (2003)). “[T]he doctrine of ripeness is intended to forestall judicial determinations of disputes until the controversy is presented in clean-cut and concrete form.” New Mexicans for Bill Richardson v. Gonzales, 64 F.3d 1495, 1499 (10th Cir. 1995) (internal quotations omitted).

Although the standing and ripeness doctrines enjoy similarities in that both are rooted in the “case or controversy” requirement and both look to “whether the challenged harm has been sufficiently realized at the time of trial,” Morgan v. McCotter, 365 F.3d 882, 890 (10th Cir. 2004), they are not the same. The Court’s determination as to whether a dispute is ripe “focuses not on whether the plaintiff was in fact harmed, but rather whether the harm asserted has matured sufficiently to warrant judicial intervention.” Kan. Judicial Review v. Stout, 519 F.3d 1107, 1116 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Morgan, 365 F.3d at 890). In other words, the ripeness doctrine “addresses a timing question: when in time is it appropriate for a court to take up the asserted claim.” Id. (quotation omitted) (emphasis in original).

Two primary factors guide the Court’s evaluation as to whether the case is ripe for disposition: (i) the fitness of the issue for judicial resolution; and (ii) the hardship to the parties of withholding judicial consideration. Sierra Club v. Yeutter, 911 F.2d 1405, 1415 (10th Cir. 1990) (quoting Abbott Labs. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 149 (1967)). In examining this first factor, the Court looks to “whether determination of the merits turns upon strictly legal issues or requires facts that may not yet be sufficiently developed.” Tex. Brine Co., LLC & Occidental Chem. Corp., 879 F.3d 1224, 1229 (10th Cir. 2018) (emphasis in original). The second factor probes what harm, if any, might befall Plaintiffs from the Court delaying consideration of the issue and the direct impact on Plaintiffs’ day-to-day activities. Yeutter, 911 F.2d at 1415. The real question is whether withholding review places Plaintiffs in “a direct and immediate dilemma.” Tex. Brine Co., 879 F.3d at 1230.

With regard to the first factor, the constitutionality of § 3(l)(1) is clearly not fit for judicial resolution at this time. H.B. 2332 does not go into effect until January 1, 2022, and Defendant Schwab has not even had a chance to draft implementing regulations – as the statute calls upon him to do, id. § 3(m) – that will provide guidance for both Plaintiffs and the Court in interpreting the contours and constitutionality of the statute. Without the benefit of such regulations, the legal parameters of § 3(l)(1) are unknown. The facts underlying any potential dispute are likewise mostly unknown since they have not yet occurred. As such, any ruling by the Court on Plaintiffs’ vagueness claim would be premature.

Second, there is no pending enforcement action under investigation or fine of Plaintiffs’ respective members. Nor could there be. Thus, any allegation by Plaintiffs that they fear possible exposure or risk in the future is a far cry from the type of actual, matured claim necessary to warrant judicial intervention. “In evaluating ripeness the central focus is on whether the case involves uncertain or contingent future events that may not occur as anticipated, or indeed may not occur at all.” Tarrant Reg’l Water Dist. v. Herrmann, 656 F.3d 1222, 1250 (10th Cir. 2011), aff’d, 569 U.S. 614 (2013). “[A] regulation is not ordinarily considered . . . ‘ripe’ for judicial review . . . until the scope of the controversy has been reduced to more manageable proportions, and its factual components fleshed out, by some concrete action applying the regulation to the claimant's situation in a fashion that harms or threatens to harm him." Nat'l Park Hospitality Ass'n, 538 U.S. at 808. Were the Court to adjudicate Plaintiffs' dispute on the merits at this time, the case would be largely undeveloped and would represent exactly the type of anticipation of contingent events that the ripeness doctrine was intended to forestall. Morgan, 365 F.3d at 891.

Further, Plaintiffs will not suffer any undue hardship from the Court's delay of a decision on the merits until Plaintiffs face a real threat of liability, should that ever occur. Any injury that Plaintiffs might suffer in the future is complete speculation. The Court's postponement of a decision until Plaintiffs do suffer some particularized, concrete injury (if they ever do) does not constitute an independent harm. Morgan, 365 F.3d at 891. In sum, Plaintiffs' claims concerning the "so-called Advocacy Ban are unripe for review and must be dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

2. Freedom of Speech and Association (Count I)

Plaintiffs broadly claim that their inability to directly mail, or indirectly cause to be mailed through third-party service contracts, advance mail voting applications to Kansans diminishes their ability to engage in core political speech by encouraging Kansans to participate in the democratic process. Plaintiffs' claims ring hollow. A proper review establishes H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(1) merely limits Plaintiffs' conduct as opposed to any protected speech.

Defendants incorporate here their discussion on the appropriate standards set forth in Part III.B.1. The only thing that H.B. 2332, § 3(l)(1) addresses is the mailing of advance mail voting applications. There is no bar whatsoever to Plaintiffs' ability to send mailers communicating the importance of voting through the mail-in process or encouraging such absentee voting methods in future elections. Plaintiffs may even direct Kansans on where to obtain advance mail voting applications and provide instructions on how to fill them out. Plaintiffs may continue their voter education efforts via mail in all respects. Plaintiffs, to the extent they are not domiciled in Kansas, simply may not mail, or cause to be mailed, the advance mail voting application directly to the Kansas voter – a logistical prohibition implemented to prevent voter confusion and voter fraud as opposed to a prohibition on the communication itself. See, e.g., Lichtenstein v. Hargett, 489 F. Supp. 3d 742, 776 (M.D. Tenn. 2020).

This case is similar to Lichtenstein where the federal court upheld a Tennessee law prohibiting distribution of absentee ballot applications by third-parties. In doing so, the court astutely recognized that the ban on distribution of absentee voter applications was not a ban on core political speech. Id. at 773. “[I]t does not restrict anyone from interacting with anyone about anything.” Id. at 770. The court detailed a long list of ways the plaintiff could encourage a person to vote using the absentee ballot application. Id. at 764–65. “[H]owever one slices it, the Law prohibits no spoken or written expression whatsoever and also leaves open a very wide swath of conduct, prohibiting just one very discrete kind of act.” Id. at 765.

In finding that distribution of absentee-ballot applications is not constitutionally protected speech, the court further noted:

[I]f unaware of any words accompanying such distribution, an observer would not have any particular reason to associate any specific message with the action of giving someone an absentee-ballot application. . . . And the observer perhaps could speculate that there is not really any discernable message at all. The Supreme Court has advised that if an observer cannot tell, without accompanying words, that the action conveys the message that plaintiff claims it conveys, then the action is not inherently expressive.

Id. at 768; accord Voting for Am., Inc. v. Andrale, 488 F. App'x 890, 898 & n.13 (5th Cir. 2012) (rejecting First Amendment challenge to statute restricting non-election officials' distribution of absentee ballots and concluding that the law did not curtail any core speech rights).

The same is true here. H.B. 2332 does not prevent Plaintiffs from publishing or mailing content that educates Kansans on how to vote in person or by mail. Nor does it prohibit Plaintiffs from providing information on where to access an advance mail voting application. It likewise does not prohibit Plaintiffs from posting or mailing content in favor of the absentee voting process. The number of ways for Plaintiffs to communicate their message to Kansas voters is virtually limitless, which undercuts their claim that § 3(D)(1) impermissibly restricts or threatens core speech. While Plaintiffs aggressively seek to fit the statutory prohibitions into a free speech box, the reality is that “[c]onduct does not become speech for First Amendment purposes merely because the person engaging in the conduct intends to express an idea.” Lichtenstein, 489 F. Supp.3d. at 766; see also Timmons, 520 U.S. at 363 (recognizing that while a person or party may express beliefs or ideas through a ballot, “[b]allots serve primarily to elect candidates, not as forums for political expression.”).

The proper standard, therefore, is the Anderson-Burdick test, described at length above. And as previously noted, the burden on Plaintiffs' advocacy work is minimal at best. Yet the State's interests in imposing restrictions on one's ability to mail advance mail voting applications to voters are substantial, outweighing any minor inconveniences that Plaintiffs may experience, particularly when subjected (as they must be) to a highly deferential rational basis review. See Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434.

The State's primary regulatory interests in restriction is the avoidance of confusion and the facilitation of an orderly and efficient administrative process in carrying out the election. Indeed, in 2020, county election officials across the State reported receiving multiple (duplicate) advance ballot applications from individuals who had themselves received multiple advance ballots application forms (often partially completed) from different out-of-state organizations. Voters were calling in to county clerks' offices angry and confused, not knowing how to handle the different forms, and frequently feeling compelled to send all the applications in. The result was chaos that greatly taxed the time and resources of already short-staffed and overworked county election offices. Unsurprisingly, this regulatory interest in orderly election administration was expressly endorsed by the Supreme Court in Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186, 198 (2010).

In addition, having multiple advance ballot applications being sent in by the same person is a recipe for potential fraud, which the State also has a strong interest in avoiding. As the Supreme Court observed less than two weeks ago, although "every voting rule imposes a burden of some sort," a "strong and entirely legitimate state interest is the prevention of fraud. Fraud can affect the outcome of a close election, and fraudulent votes dilute the right of citizens to cast ballots that carry appropriate weight. Fraud can also undermine public confidence in the fairness of elections and the perceived legitimacy of the announced outcome." Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *13. The risk of voter fraud is particularly acute with mail-in voting. See, e.g., Crawford, 553 U.S. at 195-96; Richardson, 978 F.3d at 239 ("Texas's signature-verification requirement is not designed to stymie voter fraud only in the abstract. It seeks to stop voter fraud where the problem is most acute – in the context of mail-in voting.").

The same regulatory interests at issue in Lichtenstein, which the court embraced wholeheartedly as legitimate measures to increase election integrity and decrease voter confusion, are also at play here:

Among other things, there is a rational basis to believe that by prohibiting everyone (other than election commission employees) from distributing absentee-ballot applications, the State can: (a) increase the integrity of the absentee ballot process by, among other things, better ensuring that an absentee-ballot application is being submitted by someone who truly wants to submit the application, that the applicant does not miss out on voting absentee (and perhaps, as a direct result, voting at all) due to misleading addressing or other information provided by a distributor, and that the applicant is not mistakenly provided by election officials with multiple absentee ballots; and (b) decrease the risk of voter confusion arising from, among other things, voters' receipt of (i) applications mistakenly believed by some recipients to be from election officials, (ii) applications from multiple distributors, or (iii) incorrect addressing or other information from the distributor regarding absentee voting.

Lichtenstein, 489 F. Supp.3d at 783-84.

The restriction on non-Kansans mailing advance mail voting applications to Kansas residents is entirely reasonable. It is a non-discriminatory preventative measure that leaves open virtually every conceivable type of written and/or verbal expression except one – the distribution of advance ballot applications by third-parties not domiciled in Kansas. While we question the premise that any voters might be negatively affected by the law, even if they are, that would not justify an invalidation of the statute. Not only is there no narrow tailoring requirement under Anderson-Burdick, but as the Supreme Court recently explained, the State's "entire system of voting" – not just the impact on a small segment of the electorate – must be examined "when assessing the burden imposed by a challenged provision." Brnovich, 2021 WL 2690267, at *13. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' challenge to § 3(l)(1) in Count I must be dismissed.

3. Overbreadth (Count IV)

Plaintiffs claim H.B. 2332 § 3(I)(1) is unconstitutionally overbroad as well because it prevents Plaintiffs from engaging out-of-state vendors for the purpose of mailing advance mail voting applications to Kansas voters, thereby limiting their protected speech. (Pet. ¶ 211). Plaintiffs aver it is impossible to distinguish unconstitutional contracts from their constitutional counterparts. Id. Once again Plaintiffs are mistaken about what constitutes core political speech. The act of mailing an advance mail voting application does not qualify.

It appears Plaintiffs are raising an as-applied overbreadth claim. Defendants incorporate their prior recitation of the applicable standards for reviewing an overbreadth challenge discussed in Part III.B.2 of this Memorandum.

An overbreadth challenge is designed to protect impairment to a constitutionally protected activity. See Hicks, 539 U.S. at 118–19. When considering an as-applied overbreadth challenge, courts recognize that the statute in question may be constitutional in many of its applications, but is not so as applied to the plaintiff and applicable circumstances. See N.M. Youth Organized v. Herrera, 611 F.3d 669, 677 n.5 (10th Cir. 2010). But as already addressed in Part III.E.2, the act of mailing or causing to be mailed an advance mail voting application to a Kansas voter is not protected speech. Indeed, there are an infinite number of ways for Plaintiffs to communicate their message to Kansas voters that are not limited by § 3(I)(1).

Additionally, as Kansas-domiciled entities, Plaintiffs are free to send advance mail voting applications to Kansas voters as long as the applications are not partially completed. And there is no prohibition on Plaintiffs contracting with Kansas vendors to mail advance mail voting applications to Kansas residents. Nor have Plaintiffs alleged that such in-state vendors do not exist. Thus, Plaintiffs retain an array of options for effecting their desire to send advance mail voting applications to Kansas voters.

Regardless, even if the law touches on political speech protected by the First Amendment or its Kansas analogue, declaring the statute invalid would be inappropriate given the State's interests in preventing voter confusion, preserving resources, and operating smooth elections without devoting time to resolving issues related to duplicate applications. "The Supreme Court has noted that 'there comes a point at which the chilling effect of an overbroad law, significant though it may be, cannot justify prohibiting all enforcement of that law – particularly a law that reflects legitimate state interests in maintaining comprehensive controls over harmful, constitutionally unprotected conduct.'" Faustin v. City & Cty. of Denver, Colo., 423 F.3d 1192, 1199 (10th Cir. 2005) (quoting Hicks, 539 U.S. at 119). "[T]he responsibility for conducting a fair, open, and safe election . . . is the primary and substantial responsibility of the Executive and Legislative branches of the [state] government." Democracy N. Carolina, 476 F. Supp.3d at 169. H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(1) is not unconstitutionally overbroad and Plaintiffs' claim must be dismissed.

4. Vagueness (Count V)

In what appears to be a last ditch effort to strike down the ban on out-of-state entities sending advance mail voting applications to Kansas voters, Plaintiffs launch a vagueness attack on H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(1). Application of common sense easily forecloses relief on this claim. Defendants incorporate herein their recitation of the legal standards for a vagueness challenge from Part III.B.3.

H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(1) provides: "No person shall mail or cause to be mailed an application for an advance voting ballot, unless such person is a resident of this state or is otherwise domiciled in this state.” The focal point of the statute is on the person mailing or causing the mailing of an advance mail voting application. It would be absurd to interpret § 3(l)(1) as prohibiting a Kansas resident or entity domiciled in Kansas, such as Plaintiffs, from mailing an absentee voting application to a Kansas voter. Moreover, much of Plaintiffs’ fears regarding the so-called Advocacy Ban are unwarranted. Plaintiffs spill much ink regarding their self-professed inability to mail application materials to help voters register to vote by mail in the form of postcards. (Pet. ¶ 116). But a postcard is not an absentee voter application and may continue to be mailed by Plaintiffs or Plaintiffs’ service providers.

Plaintiffs also allege § 3(l)(1) hampers their ability to engage out-of-state vendors for the purpose of educating Kansas voters on applying for advance voting. (Pet. ¶ 118). But § 3(l)(1) does no such thing. The express text of the statute, and any reasonable interpretation thereof, establishes that only the mailing of, or the act of causing to be mailed, an advance mail voting application by a non-Kansas resident is prohibited. Plaintiffs are free to mail postcards and other educational materials to Kansas voters. Plaintiffs are likewise unconstrained in their ability to contract with out-of-state vendors to print and mail Plaintiffs’ postcards and other educational materials about advance mail voting in Kansas.

“This court presumes that statutes are constitutional and resolves all doubts in favor of passing constitutional muster. If there is any reasonable way to construe a statute as constitutionally valid, this court has both the authority and duty to engage in such a construction.” Matter of A.B., 484 P.3d at 230; Bollinger, 302 Kan. at 318. Here, a person of ordinary intelligence is capable of understanding what minimal conduct is restricted by § 3(l)(1), i.e., a non-Kansas person or entity may not mail or direct the mailing of an advance mail voting application to a Kansas resident. Moreover, it is difficult to see how there could have been arbitrary enforcement of this statute by Defendant Schmidt, as he is the only person authorized to investigate a complaint and file an action for a violation of § 3(l)(1), see H.B. 2332 § 3(l)(2), and he has done nothing to date.

Plaintiffs' concerns regarding the so-called vagueness of § 3(l)(1) also support Defendants' arguments as to why Plaintiffs' claims are unripe. Defendant Schwab has not had a chance to draft implementing regulations that will provide guidance for Plaintiffs and the Court in interpreting the contours and constitutionality of § 3(l)(1). Indeed, it is entirely possible that such regulations may provide the guidance, at least in part, that Plaintiffs are looking for. As such, any ruling by the Court on Plaintiffs' vagueness claim would be premature. Plaintiffs' vagueness challenge to § 3(l)(1) thus must be dismissed.

IV. – Conclusion

In sum, this case presents no justiciable controversy given that Plaintiffs have no standing to bring their claims, the so-called “Advocacy Ban” claims are not even ripe for review, and not a single one of Plaintiffs' claims has legal merit in light of the highly deferential standard that governs these type of election-integrity statutes. Plaintiffs have flung every imaginable claim at the State's new election integrity statutes, desperately hoping that something – anything – will stick. Nothing can. Defendants thus request that the Court dismiss Plaintiffs' Complaint.
